Taft Answers Newspaper Attacks on Canal.

First, as to the sinking of the Gatun Dam. The report of the newspaper correspondent, like so many other statements made with respect to a matter two thousand miles away, under the influence of a desire to be sensational and startling, was founded purely on imagination. The only foundation for the statement was that in a comparative small stretch on the site of the dam, perhaps two hundred feet across, some rough material had been piled up on the upward side of the dam, and there had been excavated immediately back of this pile or dump a lot of material from an old French diversion channel; that the water accumulated above this dump in the very heavy rains; that the water behind the dump and the material there had been taken out; and that there was a slide down into the cavity that had been made just back of the dump. The slide could not have been more than one hundred feet. The mass was not more than two hundred feet across, and on a personal examination, for I was there, it was evidently nothing more than an ordinary slide such as frequently occurs in the construction of railroad banks and other hills when they are not properly balanced, and are without the proper slope. It is not a danger that cannot be provided against, and, indeed, the shape and form and exact method of building the dam are for no other than to avoid the danger of a slide due to the lack of proper force in the material put into the dam.
